What is a peer reviewed journal?

A peer-reviewed journal is a special type of research journal where experts check and review articles before they are published. This process ensures that the information is correct, high-quality, and useful for researchers, students, and professionals. When a researcher writes an article, it is sent to other experts (called peer reviewers) in the same field. These experts read the article carefully, check the facts, methods, and conclusions, and suggest improvements if needed. If the article meets all the standards, it gets published in the journal. Peer-reviewed journals are trusted because they contain well-checked and reliable research. They are commonly used in universities, research institutions, and professional fields. Examples include medical, engineering, and science journals.

How do I know a journal is peer-reviewed?

To check if a journal is peer-reviewed, follow these steps:

Check the journal's website – Look for terms like “Peer Review and Publication Policy”.

Look for the review process – A good journal mentions double-blind or expert review methods.

Check the editorial board – Presence of well-known researchers and experts is a good sign.

Review published articles – Peer-reviewed journals have structured articles with abstracts, references, and research methodology.

Is peer reviewed journal is UGC approved?

Not all peer-reviewed journals are UGC-approved, but all UGC-approved journals are typically peer-reviewed. For example: AkiNik Publication's journals are fully peer reviewed and considered as best peer reviewed journals. The list of Peer reviewed journal can be accessed through the below link: <https://www.akinik.com/JournalsList.pdf>

*UGC care list abolished by UGC, Researchers advised to publish articles in Peer reviewed journals.
